Plate LXX, A and B, shows the various constituents distinctly; the gray humic matter, the dark carbonaceous matter, some of it in very minute particles, the more homogeneous resinous bodies, and the lighter spore matter are all shown as individual particles. Attention is again called to the fact that the original areas represented in Plate LXX, A and B, are only one-tenth of 1 millimeter in diameter. THE OAK MINE COAL J HORIZONTAL SECTIONS. As in examination of the anthraxylon components, sections of the attritus cut parallel to the bedding planes are particularly well suited for the examination of its components. The remaining plant cells of the components of the debris, like the cells of the larger anthraxylon coal, are mostly flattened, lying horizontal with the bedding planes. A section through them, or including them in whole or in part, exposes the larger part or surface to view, and if any characters are retained they are far better visible on the broad sides than on the edges exposed in a cross section. Plate LXI, A (magnified 150 times), Plate LXI, /?, taken from an area included in the former and magnified 1,000 times, Plate LXII, A (magnified 150 times), and Plate LXII, B (magnified 1,000 times), from an area included in Plate LXII, A, are from horizontal sections prepared from the same sample as Plate XLIV, -4, and Plate XLV, B. It must be considered that the photographs represent only a small part..
